| Learning outcomes | At the end of this learning unit, the student is able to : The course relates to the analysis of the various collective facets present in human rights legislation and to the other specific rights related to one of these facets. In an interdisciplinary manner, the course strives to show how the philosophical, political and legal objections which have been traditionally addressed to the emergence of the "collective dimensions" in the human rights discourse can explain the relative failure, on a purely legal level, of the enforcement of one or more of the rights characterised by such dimensions. Attention is also paid, in an interdisciplinary manner, to the various strategies which can be implemented to overcome, in whole or in part, such failures. |
| Evaluation methods | Written examination based on two questions (one mandatory question and one question to be chosen from two possible questions). |
| Teaching methods | Ex cathedra lectures illustrated by the analyses of cases resulting from the decisions of universal or regional monitoring bodies. The course is accompanied by a support class during which the case analyses are covered in greater detail. |
