This learning unit is not open to incoming exchange students!

Language :	French
Place of the course	Louvain-la-Neuve
Main themes	The paper will specifically follow the conventional two-fold historical approach which considers, respectively: (1) The 'external' history, i.e. the study of legal sources and authorities, the social and political actors, collective representations, etc. (2) The 'internal' history, i.e. the development of positive law (substantive and adjective), of legal and judicial practice, of the courts' system and structures, of the law's and the administration of justice's purpose in a non-legal context and perspective. The specific topics which will be discussed may vary from one year to another. They will be sufficiently versatile, so that students from different backgrounds may achieve the aims stated above. For example, in the case of law students, their specialisation in private law, criminal law, constitutional law etc. will be taken into account; in the case of history students, whose work requires them to deal with legal sources and institutions, any tasks will focus on the period of their specialisation.
Learning outcomes
Evaluation methods	For A. Wijffels' part of the course, the students will be provisionally assessed on the basis of their contribution to the oral report in their group (cf. supra), but the final mark will be based on their individual written submission after revision.
Teaching methods	A. Wijffels' part (in English, cf. supra) will consist in a few informative classes about the topic and the issue. Students, in small groups of three or four, will be given task consisting in reporting on their reading of a variety of sources around a more specific topic related to the theme of the year. They will report in group orally (each member of the group speaking individually); the report will be discussed with the lecturer, who may offer critical feedback, suggestions and advice, and each student will then submit a revised short paper on her or his contribution to the group's report. That individual paper is decisive for the mark with regard to this part of the course. Please note that each student has to fulfill the requirements for both parts of the course (i.e. both for Pr. X. Rousseaux and Pr. A. Wijffels) . If a student fails to submit his or her work for one of the two parts, no marks will be given for the course at all. All the teaching and the group discussions take place in situ. In 2019-2020, it has been necessary to switch entirely to on-line methods. The experience has shown that this was perfectly possible, albeit at the cost of less live interaction and discussion. In situ classes will have priority in 2020-2021, although some hybrid form of teaching may be introduced if need be. A full switch to remote on-line teaching will only be decided if the circumstances absolutely require to do so.
Content	The part of the course managed by A. Wijffels will be entirely in English: the classes will be in English, all communication and discussions will be in English, and the students' work will have to be written in English. The topic may vary from year to year. It usually deals with issues of Anglo-American law. For example, in recent years, topics have included: The House of Lords Reform; Brexit and the UK British Constitution. The general approach is one of comparative legal history. It requires students to work on primary sources of (mostly, modern) legal history, often related to contemporary issues.
Inline resources	Depending each year on the topic of the course, all reading material for Wijffels' part of the course will be provided through Moodle. Additional material for the group presentation and the written paper may be sought in different locations (e.g. libraries and internet).
